School-Wide Family Engagement Strategies

Strategy Two: Partnering with families to support student achievement. Identify an individual at your school/LEA who is successful in building partnerships with parents. What are they doing to accomplish this goal?

Strategy One: Creating a welcoming and engaging climate with strong relationships and communications between families and school staff

between fa	milies and school staff
Objective	Stage 1	Stage 2	Stage 3	Stage 4
1.1 The school values families as important partners in their students' education.	Families think the school would rather they not be involved. School staff believes that families aren't really capable of partnering in their student's education, or that it is more trouble than it is worth to engage families. School staff does not articulate to families that their involvement is important. The school does not pro-actively reach out to engage its families. Sounds like: My parents are the reason my kids are so far behind. Engaging parents won't help my students do better in school. I can't engage my parents because they don't value an education. It's not my job to engage parents. There's nothing I can do to get families to step up.	Families think the school does not really care if they are involved or not. School staff believes that families have too many needs or are too busy to partner in their student's education. School staff may articulate to families that their involvement is important, but not that they want to partner. The school makes initial efforts to engage families, but these efforts are not sustained throughout the year. If families are not responsive to initial outreach, the school does not make additional efforts to engage them. As a result, the school's family engagement approaches do not equitably serve all families. Sounds like: I try hard to get parents to be involved but it's not my fault if they don't show up. I don't want to bother families by asking them to be involved. Families might want the best for their students, but they can't do what they need	Families describe the school as committed to engaging families but sometimes unable to do so meaningfully because of other school priorities. School staff believes that most families can be effective partners in their student's education and they try various strategies to support them. School staff articulates to families that they want to partner and why it is important. The school makes sustained efforts to engage all families. The school successfully reaches some families, but usually is not able to reach their "hard to reach" families. As a result, the school's family engagement approaches do not equitably serve all families. Sounds like: • To really know my students, I must know my families. • I want families to feel good about our school. • I try, but there are some families who I just can't get in touch with.	Families describe the school as committed to engaging families and willing to put in the time and attention to make it a priority. School staff believes that all families, if treated respectfully and given the necessary tools, can be effective partners in their student's education. School staff articulate to families that they want to partner and explain to families what that looks like and why it is important. The school is relentless in ensuring that every student's family is engaged in the success of their student. The school is persistent and creative in reaching all families, regardless of their circumstances, and their efforts reach all families equitably. Sounds like: My parents are the most important partners in helping my students succeed. All families want the best for their children. I tell families I want them

1.3 The school has a respectful, inclusive community in which families feel connected to one another.	Families are disconnected from one another. Families who transition into and out of the school feel lost and isolated.	There are pockets of family "cliques" in which families know one another and feel their voice is included or respected, but many families do not know others. There may be tensions between different groups of families. Families who transition into and out of the school struggle to understand their expectations and options.	Most families know other families in their class and at the school and call on each other for help. Most families feel that their voice or perspective is included and respected by other families or school staff. Some families may feel that their voices are "drowned out" by families who may consume much of the teachers' time and occupy many of the school leadership roles. Families who transition into and out of the school can easily access information from school staff or other families.	Families have strong relationships with other families at the school and feel that their voice or perspective is included and respected equitably across engagement opportunities. Families who transition into and out of the school have pro-active guidance and support from school staff, programs, and other families. The school has substantial information about how families prefer to communicate and how to get in touch with families.

Home-school communication mechanisms consistently meet the literacy, language, and media preferences of ELL, low-literacy, or other "hard-to-reach" families. Communication is frequent, consistent, and occurs in multiple ways.

School communication is streamlined so that families can easily prioritize and understand its relevance for their student. Communications feature families as valued partners in the school sommunity.

				for families based on student performance
2.2 The school provides the information and guidance for families to effectively and regularly monitor their student's progress on academic goals.	Teachers do not know what families' goals are for their students. Families do not know what their teacher's goals are for their students. Families receive information on their student based on the bare minimum required by the school, local/state policies, and federal policies. This information usually comes at the end of the grading period when little can be done about it.	Teachers do not know what families' goals are for their students. Families do not know what their teachers' goals are for their students. In addition to the required information at the end of the grading period, families receive some information about how their student is doing. The teacher may send home quizzes, tests, and graded homework periodically. The teacher may send a note or call home if there are issues with discipline or homework completion.	Teachers know what families' long-term goals are for their students. Families know what their teachers' annual goals are for their students. Goals are not broken down into actionable time frames. Families receive regular information about their student's performance, but it is not compared to their goals, so it is not easy for families to know if their student is on track.	Teachers know what families' long-term goals are for their students. Teachers share their long- and short-term goals for students with families and seek their input. Families and teachers communicate regularly about short- and long-term goals and set new goals periodically. Families receive frequent information about how their student is progressing relative to their goals, other students, and grade-level standards. Teachers regularly check for families' understanding of whether their student is on track.

Even if the school is struggling, the school is transparent and honest with families about how the school is doing. The school holds a well-publicized meeting and sends school performance information home to families in written form. As a result, most families can articulate whether their school is below average, average, or above average in its average, or above average in its performance and whether it has performance and whether it has years.

3.2 The school ensures that families participate in collaborative strategic planning for school improvement.	Families are not involved in creating the School Improvement Plans. The school does not have a plan for getting families' input into developing this plan. The school does not provide norms or capacity-building opportunities so that families can participate in this planning.	Families are engaged in creating the School Improvement Plan through serving on the needed committee, though these families may not be representative of the school community. The school does not have a plan for getting families' input into developing this plan. The school does not provide norms or capacity-building opportunities so that families can participate in this planning.	Families are engaged in creating the School Improvement Plan by providing input at one point in time or through serving on the assigned committee. The school has a clear process in place to get families' input in developing this plan. As a result, it is mostly representative of the feedback of all families. The school has norms, but no capacity-building opportunities, so that families can participate as equal partners in this planning.	Families are consistently engaged in creating the School Improvement Plan at multiple stages in its development or by serving on the assigned committee. The school has a clear process in place to get families' input in developing this plan. Families participating in this process are representative of the school community and regularly communicate with other families to get ideas and feedback. The school has norms and capacity-building opportunities, such as leadership development

3.4 School staff work closely with community organizations, businesses, and institutions of higher education to strengthen the school, and make resources available to students, school staff, and families.	The school does not ask families what additional programs or services they need to support their student's achievement. The school does not know what resources and assets exist in the community.	The school determines families' needs and preferences for additional programs or services they need to support their student's achievement from conversations with a few families or general demographic data. The school has some idea of what resources and assets exist in the community. The school partners with community organizations or agencies, but these partnerships are not aligned to the school's goals or purposeful in meeting families' needs and preferences, so they can be better guides, partners, and advocates for their student's education.	The school determines families' needs and preferences for additional programs or services they need to support their student's achievement from data collected from at least 50% of the school's families. The school knows what resources and assets exist in the community.
